

Published based on Managing Your Rabbit's Nutritional Requirements

Managing Your Rabbit's Nutritional Requirements

The Importance of Fibre

A fresh supply of hay has to be available each day. Bunnies are fibrevores, and this means they need fibre in their day-to-day diet. Hay includes magnesium along with calcium, and fresh hay also includes grass and herbs. It is possible to gauge exactly how fresh the hay is simply by the colour and appearance. Poor quality hay will be yellowish in colouring, as well as being dry and dusty. Fresh hay will be greener in colour, and smells similar to freshly mown grass. Hay can be purchased independently, and combined with grass (referred to as forage).

Fresh fruit, veggies

Bunnys absolutely adore dandelion leaves as well as fresh grass, but you must be sure that the area you allow the rabbit to graze from has not been dirtied by other pets, or sprayed by harsh chemicals. That's why it is usually far better pick dandelions from your own garden. Bunnys love eating fruit and veggies, and all have to be fresh and uncooked. When you will discover any leftover pieces they should be taken out of the hutch or rabbit run after an hour or so, prior to when they end up damp or rotten. Lettuce ought to always be avoided considering that it can make bunnys extremely sleepy. When choosing rabbit food you should only stock up on the dietary fibre rich products and stay clear of feeding any kind of muesli type feeds.

Rabbit Pet Treats

To give a bunny a treat, you'll be able to let them have their own preferred sort of fresh fruit or veggie (it is easy to work out which is his or her favourite as they will feed on it without delay the moment it is positioned next to them) or you might allow them to have a store bought treat for example a chew treat. You can actually let them have an outdoor twig to gnaw on, the most suitable branches happen to be from deciduous or fruit trees. These will help to keep the rabbits teeth in good condition. Or you can provide the bunny a bit of hard, stale bread (certainly not rotten), {which} again will help their teeth.

Don't give a rabbit a treat that has loads of sodium, sugar, or fat.

Water

Refreshing, clean water really should be offered all the time for your rabbit. It should be offered in a clean drink flask, and flasks really should be washed fairly often, simply because plankton could develop within the bottle.

You can also find this article published on Managing Your Rabbit's Nutritional Requirements, and on the tag pages Bunnys, colour, fruit, grass hay, mown grass, rotten lettuce.