Seven Facts Of A Kitten

A kitten is just like a baby that will grow right before your eyes. They start off lying in your arms looking at peace with the world but before you know it they're at the "toddler" stage and running up drapes and under rugs!

Kittens are choosy with their food. Even the smallest kitten will spit out everything it doesn't believe to be the very best available oh and "the best" is very subjective, it depends less on the price/brand and more on the cat's likes and dislikes!

Which brings us onto number 3, your kitten will grow into an opinionated cat with strong likes and dislikes. They will requisition anything that will be to their fancy furniture, sheets, your shoes, etc. It will have no regards with what you feel about things.

Kittens have a way of endearing themselves to people and it is not rare to see kittens ensconcing themselves on the laps of passing friends who are complete strangers to them.

If you allow them, cats will deceive you into thinking they could not be trained, because the fact is that cats are trainable. If you can train them to use the litter box, there is no reason why you cannot teach them other things. Still the fact remains that by nature cats are not willing learners and will require and test your will and perseverance.

A kitten will grow, and grow fast. That will be a food for thought every time you are amused by the kitten worming its way beside you at night. Soon your kitten will think that it is his God given right to sit in your lap and appropriate your bed, and no amount of discouragement will deter him to claim this right.

A kitten will quickly worm itself into your heart and stay there so make sure you only take enough money to buy one or you could end up bringing two or three home because you couldn't choose between two of them, and then the third one looked so lonely!
